

Estimates of prevalence based on population sampling will remain stable over time if true prevalence is stable.

Estimates of prevalence based on individuals accessing services can create an illusion of an increase in prevalence over time, yet still underestimate prevalence at both time points.